The livelihood security of many people depends on the use of forest resources. People share their livelihood source not only with other people, but also with animals. The use of this limited resource leads to conflicts in many places and facets.

The objectives of this side event are twofold: 1) to promote discussion about the importance and potential of environmental peacebuilding tools and approaches for healthy forests and sustainable livelihoods, and 2) to build awareness about relevant resources for practitioners and researchers, such as the Environmental Peacebuilding community of practice and Association
